Histological and ultrastructural features. Skin biopsies were obtained from nine cetaceans stranded between November 1982 and September 1987 in the Tyrrhenian coast of Italy. Six animals were males while three were females. Species included were: common dolphin (Delphinus delphis), common porpoise (Phocoena phocoena), false killer whale (Pseudorca crassidens) and pilot whale (Globicephala pilot). Skin samples were fixed by immersion in Bouin and then embedded in paraffin. Histological sections were examined using light and electron microscopy. Cetacean skin had a thick epidermis with an irregular surface that was multilayered and composed of flattened cells of different size and heterogeneous pigmentation. The main epidermal features were a well-developed stratum corneum and a keratinised layer of the stratum granulosum with keratohyaline granules. A granular layer was composed of cells with a vacuolated cytoplasm similar to the stratum malpighii of other mammalian species. These cell were polymorphous and some cells contained electron-dense pigmented organelles. A multicompartmental cutaneous gland was present, with secretory cells containing an abundant secretory canaliculus and a less abundant lumen. The eccrine pore was irregular in shape, sometimes elongated or branched and often open to the dermis. The epidermal nerve plexus was distributed all over the epidermal surface. While the innervation was limited to the stratum corneum in humans and in other mammalian species, it extended deep into the epidermis in these cetaceans. The dermis was irregular in structure and composed of a fibrous stratum reticulare, an abundant collagenised stratum compactum, and a proliferative and pigmented stratum spinosum. Some keratinocytes, leucocytes, and macrophages were found in the dermis. No sweat glands were observed. The stratum cor
