drone strikes are “legal,” “consistent with our values,” and “imposed by Congress.” The president also told Yahoo News that he had “no apologies” for his drone strikes in Yemen, stating: We haven’t lost a single civilian in the last three years of this program. And when I hear people suggest that somehow we are morphing into an Al Qaeda air force that’s going around blowing up innocent people, that’s just not true. The statement went viral, with prominent activists and legal observers attacking the president for allowing the drone strikes, which reportedly kill up to 20 civilians a year, according to Amnesty International. "A policy that is so easy to criticize from the comfort of a desk and even more importantly not from the perspective of those on the receiving end of the attacks, is a policy that has little place in a democracy," said Scott Gilmore, a spokesperson for the Center for Constitutional Rights. These attacks, which were reportedly authorized by President Obama, contradict all of his previous public statements on the issue. In January 2009, Obama told The Christian Science Monitor, “I am not a proponent of a drone program.” He continued, “I think we can capture a large number of people who have a grievance against the United States. ... They’re legitimate targets.” In March 2012, Obama told CBS News, “I believe that even the context of war and conflict that we’re engaged in now doesn’t change the fact that we have very explicit prohibitions in our laws against the targeted killing of Americans and those who are in the United States.” Obama also said in an interview with Wired, “I do not believe that we should be using drones to kill people who are not actively engaged in combat with us. That’s something we’ve struggled with, because in the face of an active terrorist threat, it’s hard to say, ‘Well, you know, they’re not actively engaged with us.’” In an interview on Face the Nation in February 2012
