A: No, but the security of the network on which the POS is running is the responsibility of whoever is paying for it. Generally, the POS will be hosted by some credit card processing company or "vendor" that provides the hardware, software, and support. If something happens to the equipment, it would generally be the vendor's responsibility, not yours. Depending on what kind of problems the POS has, you can send the vendor a ticket to see if they can provide some support. A federal magistrate rejected the Trump administration's demand for the courts to toss a lawsuit brought by the American Civil Liberties Union against the so-called "zero tolerance" family separation policy. Magistrate Judge Carol E. Heckman on Thursday rejected the Department of Homeland Security request for preliminary injunctions in two cases involving child migrants. The ACLU lawsuit is ongoing, while the cases themselves have largely concluded. The original policies in question were announced in April 2018, and resulted in a spike in the number of families separated in the process, followed by a last-minute increase in May 2018 amid public outcry. According to court documents, the original practice was that an adult was separated from the children upon apprehension by border agents and that the adult could also be deported if a crime was discovered. After the policy was publicized, the administration mandated that all adults be held together with their children, unless a court order was granted otherwise. The administration then reversed this policy, but the fate of the second policy was put in limbo by a court of appeals which later issued
