Bolster a culture of honesty and accountability through shared data Organisations are beginning to realise the importance of data as a competitive advantage and the driver of competitive differentiation. The potential for organisations to use data to directly enhance their competitive position is so great that best-practice recommendations are emerging to inform organisations on how to go about this. Data is generally understood as a fact, an information asset that can be used to make decisions. It's easy to view data as a by-product of the company's success, but the real value of data is based on the "big picture" and the potential it has for helping organisations to respond effectively and deliver value. The data-driven approach is now seen as an integral part of a competitive strategy, allowing organisations to quickly learn and adapt in a constantly changing environment. By gathering, analysing and mining their data, organisations can improve their service offerings and customer experiences and deliver a better product or service, and are able to identify new products or services that they can develop. However, data is just one part of a big picture. To be effective, it must also be linked to other critical elements such as culture and leadership to ensure that it is effective. Companies must ensure that their decision-making processes, processes such as buying, selling and working, are all underpinned by a culture of honesty and integrity. They need to have the right organisational
