Game ParadiseBirds - Anna and Nelly (short).mpg hit ByOral mucosal erosions induced by tannin and polyphenol-rich foods and beverages. Some tannin-rich foods and beverages have previously been implicated in the induction of oral mucosal erosions. This study examines the ability of individual tannins and polyphenols to induce lesions in mice. An in vitro tongue-pouch model was used to determine if the erosions produced by tannins were inhibited by tannase. The in vivo response to tannin-rich foods and beverages was studied in Balb/c mice and compared with that produced by a histamine H(2) receptor antagonist (ranitidine). In vitro, tannase treatment significantly reduced the number of lesions produced by cranberry, cherry, apple, raspberry, grape, and ginkgo. A mixture of 50 tannins and polyphenols reproduced the effects of the tannin-rich foods and beverages; when the tannin and polyphenol content was standardized to the equivalent of 8 g fresh cranberry fruit, the effect was equivalent to the effects of 10 g cranberry fruit. In vivo, tannins induced oral mucosal erosions that were reduced by ranitidine (8 mg/kg, p.o.). However, the tannins were more potent than ranitidine in producing erosions (corresponding to cranberry, 1% tannins/0.5% saccharin; ginkgo, 0.1% tannins/0.5% sucrose) and in mice more sensitive to the erosive effects (sub-clinical erosions in mice exposed to cranberry, apple, or ginkgo). Tannin-rich foods and beverages and the mixture of tannins and polyphenols induced mucosal erosions that were reduced by tannase. Thus, these findings support the idea that tannins and polyphenols are implicated in the pathogenesis of oral erosive disease. You know what it means when everyone at the office is getting thanked for "what they do" and you know that you haven't done a darn thing...even though you're the one who got everyone off on the right foot. When you've spent the last 6 hours a day trying to get several different people all up and running, and then see them email you and thank you for your hard work - even though it's not really your hard work - you know you've been thanked! I was paged by my manager at work yesterday that someone else was paged and that I should stop by to look. He told me that I 2d92ce491b
