The word suseki is Japanese for "marbled seven rocks", referring to the number of stones traditionally used to form a suseki. Each suseki is typically made from a single rock or a group of rocks. Etymology The word suseki in Japanese literally means "marbled seven rocks", and is taken from the Chinese word, meaning seven rocks. In ancient China, these rock sculptures were often used to form a dragon's body or several snakes, or an assortment of trees, fruit trees, rocks, and grasses. In Japan, suseki became a popular form of landscape design that was first used in the Kamakura period and blossomed in the Muromachi period. There are several interpretations for how the number of rocks relates to the traditional Chinese seven. History Although there are no written records regarding suseki or their use in Japan, it is speculated that suseki were created during the early Heian period of Japanese history (794–1185). The Japanese word for suseki is, and is made from the Japanese words "seven" and, "rock". During the Kamakura period, suseki evolved from being an artistic
