An Ohio woman has lost her first round of court battle with a doctor who charged her $500 for birth control, after claiming the birth control was a legitimate medical procedure that required a medical license. The medical license in question, Health Professionals Licensing Board, has lost its case against Carrie Thomas, whose mother attempted to have the charges dropped before the start of the trial, the Cincinnati Enquirer reported. In February 2017, Thomas was visited at her home by a woman she described as a woman doctor, who brought her paperwork to sign stating she had received a prescription for birth control, and charging $500 for the service. She told the woman that she was on Medicaid, but did not have a prescription. "She pulled out a stack of papers and a prescription pad," Thomas recalled, "She went through them line by line." "She kept repeating 'you're not required to pay.'"

Thomas asked the woman to leave, at which point the woman pointed a laser pen at her, prompting her to immediately try to leave. Thomas was unable to walk, so she dialed 9-1-1. "I called 9-1-1 and told them that this woman was trying to hurt me," she said. The doctor called police, who arrived at Thomas' home to find the woman. They took the doctor into custody and charged her with attempted kidnapping. At trial, Thomas attempted to have the case dismissed, arguing that there was no legal requirement that the doctor had a license to perform the procedure. A panel of doctors agreed with her, saying that Thomas was entitled to a free birth control prescription. They determined that there was no evidence of criminal wrongdoing on the part of the doctor, but ruled that a medical board could not force a woman to obtain a prescription. The board appealed the ruling to the Ohio Court of Appeals, where it was upheld. In the ruling, the court said that while the American Medical Association had long required that doctors have a license to practice, the practice of obstetrics fell outside of the scope of its guidance. "While physicians are required to be licensed, the board correctly found that they are not required to have a license to practice obst
