1. Field of the Invention This invention relates to an apparatus for cooking food such as meat, and particularly, a portable cooking grill.

2. Description of the Prior Art Portable cooking grills of various constructions are known. Such grills have been provided with only one main heat source, such as gas, which is used to cook the food item which is placed on a grill. The main heat source may, for instance, be gas, electric, or wood-burning, and is usually operated by an electrical switch located on the handle of the grill. Also, such cooking grills are often designed to operate as a portable barbecue. Such cooking grills do not have a plurality of heat sources for heating purposes, as do grills with multiple heat sources. Thus, there is a need for a multi-purpose grill which is portable, and which has a plurality of heat sources. Such a grill should have the versatility of having one or more heat sources that may be selectively used, as desired. Such a grill should also be simple to operate and safe in use.

Association of the rate of deacetylation of histones with cell proliferation. To examine the relationship between cell proliferation and the rate of deacetylation of histones, a method based on the separation of cell lysates from HeLa and WI-38 cells was devised to determine the relative amounts of acetylated and deacetylated forms of histone fractions. The deacetylation rate of H3, H4, and H1 did not change significantly during the cell cycle. Deacetylation of H2A was shown to be coupled to DNA synthesis, while deacetylation of H2B could not be correlated to the S phase progression of cells. The deacetylation rate of histones H3 and H4 was not significantly different in fast and slow growing HeLa cells. It is suggested that the simple increase in the rate of deacetylation during the S phase of the cell cycle does not play a major role in determining the growth rate of HeLa cells.
