I was there at the time. I was in a bar, and in the end I had to leave the bar, walk outside, and I saw the gun stuck in the mother's stomach. And then I remember that the mother had been run over by the same mother of the child. (...) I saw the mother crying, and I said to the sister: "Where's your son?" And she said, "I don't know". And I said, "If you don't know, you can't cry, you've got to keep a straight face". The mother gave up any attempt to save her child. So I looked at her, I called a midwife, but he arrived too late. The mother was just another statistic. They didn't care about her at all. The mother had just died. I was there, and I'll always have the images in my head. I had been warned that that day I would regret it; I don't remember what I regretted. So I was there, and I also remember that I didn't know who was responsible for the kidnapping. The interviews and field notes were divided into three categories: (1) general background information about the events, which included questions about the time and place of the incident, the type of transport used, the procedures for the transport, and questions about the incident itself; (2) events during the transport; and (3) general reflections about the incident. These categories are analyzed as follows:
