SINGAPORE - For the first time, students from different universities in the Southeast Asian city-state will be able to experience a new kind of student unionism. Starting from February next year, students from the National University of Singapore (NUS) and the Singapore Management University (SMU) will hold an annual academic meet at the People's Association (PA) club, for about four hours every Sunday. It is part of a concerted move by the two universities to get closer to the grassroots and build a strong bond with them in the run-up to the upcoming general election. Membership of the union was launched last year to provide a platform for students to come together to discuss political issues, and improve the diversity of students and the student body. About 2,300 students from NUS and SMU took part in the union's first General Assembly in November, where issues ranging from the importance of mental health to academic cheating were raised, among others. While the National Union of the Private Sector, or NUSUP, and SMUUP - the other two union iterations at the NUS and SMU respectively - are separate, students from the two universities will still be able to attend each other's union meetings and events. The NUS-SMU Union General Assembly, which will take place from Feb 26 to 28, will have up to 1,200 participants and will be held at the PA. It is also part of SMU's What's Next student unionism programme. NUS Vice-President (Academic) Tan Lay Thiam said that it is hoped that students will eventually be able to build on the union's foundation. "I am really looking forward to hearing from students and have something to do with them, as opposed to just reading about them. In the process of growing up, we all realise that we need to find some kind of common ground," he said. A representative of SM f3e1b3768c
