GH excess is responsible for serious alterations in glucose metabolism, linear growth, and final height, as well as metabolic and degenerative diseases. Intraoperative insulin-induced hypoglycemia is still the standard therapy for GH-secreting pituitary adenoma. The purpose of this study was to evaluate the effect of electrophysiologically induced hypoglycemia on both IGF-1 and IGF-binding protein 1 (IGFBP1) and IGFBP2 levels. Additionally, we sought to investigate the effect of human somatostatin on these mediators of growth in GH-secreting adenomas. For this purpose, serial blood samples were obtained from 11 patients with active pituitary adenomas in the fasting state and 30 minutes after administration of 2 U of insulin, 100 microg of des-AA1, des-AA1-somatostatin, or 100 microg of des-AA1-somatostatin-ACTH(1-24). Des-AA1-somatostatin was given 2 hours after the administration of insulin. On the basis of the IR-binding ability of IGFBP1 and IGFBP2, the binding to IGF-1 was studied, and in vivo IGFBP degradation was determined. On the basis of these data and the IR binding, we calculated the fractional catabolic rate (FCR) of IGFBP1. IGFBP2 levels increased after the administration of insulin, but IGF-1 levels did not change. After administration of des-AA1-somatostatin, IGFBP2 levels were increased and IGF-1 levels did not change significantly. No significant variations were observed in FCR of IGFBP1 after the treatment with somatostatin. We did not find any differences among the different groups studied, although the des-AA1-somatostatin combination was more effective at inhibiting GH secretion than des-AA1 alone. 09e8f5149f
