combination: Telehealth and community services improve access to and improve on the quality of breast cancer care. Improvement in the quality of breast cancer care is one of the priority outcomes for breast cancer screening as defined by the US Breast and Cervical Cancer Early Detection and Prevention Performance Standards (BCCPDPS). This goal is supported by the United States Preventive Services Task Force (USPSTF) but the care-continuity model used to track performance and measure achievement does not directly address the importance of getting timely treatment for people living in underserved communities. A telehealth and community services (THCS) model was developed to expand access to care and provide care that is more consistent with breast cancer screening performance standards, where people who might have
