Delivers a fully trusted MAC (Message Authentication Code) key, that can be used to prevent the alteration of data in your database. The key for a table is automatically created by the application on the fly, depending on the input data in the table. Delivers a table's primary key as a random unique number. The random number is a hash of the primary key's field and the table's name. The number is included in the file as a non-repetitive line number (n), e.g. n333. Delivers all the table's primary key fields as lines of data, e.g. all the table's field data comes from a line with the format, e.g. field1=value1. Delivers a command for dynamic text replacement in the created file. Dynamic text replacement is the replacement of one or more text characters in a line by a dynamically generated text. This text is derived from the input data of the table. Delivers a text list of all the table's column names. The table's number lines can be assigned a comment. The following table describes the table columns format name: type: This column provides a description of the column's data format (text, number, decimal). default: Default column value NULL: "NULL" column value Index: The column is used to store a key for faster access. Not applicable Index position: The column is used to store a key for faster access. Not applicable Position: A line number in the exported file. This number should not be changed. Batch: The column is used to store a key for faster access. Not applicable batch number: Batch number in the exported file. Batch size: The batch size of the exported file. 1000: Default batch size Not applicable Comments: The comment text for this column. False: "False" string True: "True" string Other: The data format of this column This column can be set as hidden. To hide a column, set its default value to NULL and set its type to number. Delivers a program that controls and rewrites a table's data. The export operation consists of three phases: ♦ 1d6a3396d6
