The present invention relates generally to devices used to separate dry particles from the gas stream in which they are contained. More specifically, the present invention relates to a device used to separate dry particles from the gas stream in which they are contained. According to the National Academies of Science, 1993 Report on Reliability, Safety, Security and Environmental Impact of High-Voltage Direct-Current Power Lines and Systems, electrical power lines transmitting power at higher voltages are more likely to be the source of risk of injury or death to people in the vicinity. A significant number of injuries and deaths occur when people are shocked by contact with high-voltage power lines. A high risk of injury or death also exists when people are impacted by falling trees, logs, or other objects that collide with the power lines. Likewise, animals such as deer, sheep, and horses that are not tethered may also be injured or killed by power lines, and are also a risk of injury or death. Injuries or deaths can occur with little or no warning, and in some instances, there is no warning that a tree, log, or animal has fallen onto power
