"extremism and violence". "It will lead to a stronger political presence of the EU on the ground in Bosnia and Herzegovina," EU foreign affairs chief Federica Mogherini said. In a tweet, Mogherini added: "We will also be working together with local communities, both Bosniak and Serb, to counter extremism and violence". The Twitter post came just a few days after the European Council warned that Bosnia risks returning to a state of war if members do not act decisively.

"We have a common security and defence policy. We will have a common security and defence policy for Bosnia and Herzegovina, as well," Mogherini said on Saturday. Bosnia remains at the heart of Europe's divide between the west and the east, as fears of Islamic State militants, some possibly linked to the refugee crisis, have raised worries of a resurgence of the war that killed more than 100,000 people in the 1990s. The European Commission has also warned that local jihadists could fan out from Syria and the Iraq and Afghanistan wars through the Balkans and pose a threat to Europe. Last month, the European Union pledged to relocate up to 2,000 Syrian refugees from camps across the Middle East and Asia to the Balkans.
