Once you turn the audio processing to ON, MAutoVolume is ready to work its magic, and everything from the volume level to the threshold needs to be set and adjusted. MAutoVolume is a plugin that has been designed to help you create "automated" mixes by allowing you to balance the sound levels of whatever you are working with and whatever else you might want to place within the same mix. All you have to do is to select your desired balance setting from the preset list and then select what you want the A/B function to handle. It is worth mentioning that a click of a button is all it takes to bring up the display, which makes things a lot easier than with other software solutions. The tweaking is all about choosing from the different processing methods, ranging from High Shelf, Main Shelf, EQ, Saturation, Reverb, Panner, and Attenuation. If you want to fine-tune what you have done so far, a basic level balancing is up to you, which means that you can rely on that particular feature to get things just right. There is a more advanced version included, which is called M/S. It is worth mentioning that you can work with up to 16x upsampling. This means you can automatically multiply the speed by which audio is processed. The other related features include stereo, surround, and center modes, which will come in handy when it comes to mixing and mastering. The volume output of the A/B function is included among the extras, which means that the plugin will also come in handy for producers who are working with other elements.
