FreeIn the manufacture of glass fibers and other continuous length glass fibers each individual fiber is produced by attenuating a molten glass in the vicinity of a bushing or orifice. One type of bushing is a rotary bushing from which an entire length of fiber is drawn. In a rotary bushing, molten glass is forced through a rotary orifice defined by cooperating concentric rotary and stationary glass plates in which the outer stationary plate and the inner rotary plate rotate one with respect to the other at relatively high speed. The rotary bushing is generally housed in a heating chamber or furnace where a hot blast provides the heat energy to maintain the bushing at the glass melting temperature, typically about 1,200.degree. C. The bushing is usually mounted on a bushing holder which is supported within the heating chamber by a support platform through which the bushing extends. The outer stationary glass plate includes a stationary glass flange welded to the housing, which in turn is supported by the bushing support platform. The inner rotary glass plate includes an inner bushing flange having one or more heating elements secured thereto. The inner bushing flange is mounted on the bushing holder to rotate therewith. The bushing flanges and bushing holder are designed to cooperate to provide a rotary feed of molten glass through the bushing which forces the molten glass to assume a continuous stream of molten glass and attenuates the glass to form a fiber. As the molten glass passes through the bushing, it is cooled and formed into strands of desired diameter. In the process, the molten glass tends to form a wad. When a wad of glass is formed in the bushing, the bushing holder must be turned on a vertical axis to dislodge the wad from the bushing. In the past, wad dislodging has
