History Operation Sabotage Mauritius heads to the polls in April and the islanders turned their back on the outgoing Liberal Party government in November 2002. The new government, which came to power on the back of a landslide electoral victory, quickly sought to form a new alliance. These include the Mauritanian Union for Democracy and Development (UMDD) and the Mauritian Socialist Movement (MSM). Together they established the Popular Front alliance. The MSM, MSM-PFM, and UMDD were collectively christened as the National Alliance. The MMA dominated the alliance, and when it was finally decided who would head the alliance, it was the party of the outgoing head, the MMA, which got the role. The MSM-PFM, which had won the election in 2002 and now headed the government, refused to work with the MSM on a number of issues and they soon broke away to set up the Alliance of the Forces of Progress (AFE). AFE, which was seen by many as just a four-year ruse to give MMA a vote of confidence, also had a history of disagreements with MSM-PFM. The MSM-PFM won a by-election in 2007 and continued as opposition. The Defiance Party, led by Ricardo Roosna, was the leading party of the Alliance of the Forces of Progress (AFE), but it had splintered in 2004 and formed the New Alliance. The New Alliance included the major parties of that era, the MSM-PFM, the MMA, and the Defiance Party. Victory The Ma Oye People's Party (MOYE), which is culturally distinct from all Mauritians but is well organised and has a well-
