TecMap TecMap is a geospatial software tool for topological mappings of land. It includes support for the "KML Covering" feature, which can save a KML file, which can be opened in other software such as Google Earth and even Word. It is released under the GNU General Public License v2. History TecMap was originally developed by the University of Connecticut's Center for Geographic Information (CGI) and served as the standard commercial topological software for CADASTER, CGI's CAD software package. As a user of CADASTER, it was difficult for me to function with a program that wasn't user-friendly. This forced me to port TecMap to the Microsoft Windows platform for the first time. From the start, TecMap was designed to be a "plug-in" within CADASTER, which did not limit its use outside of CADASTER's interface, despite TecMap being based on the CUDALink library, which only runs inside of CADASTER. Furthermore, TecMap came bundled with the CUDALink library, the topological library used in CADASTER, for a more robust software package. As CADASTER was used primarily for autocad, the version of TecMap bundled with CADASTER was compatible with the rest of CADASTER's features. In May 2001, free source CADASTER and TecMap were released. Even though that version of TecMap was based on the CUDALink library, the library was sufficiently redesigned to be able to run and compile as a stand alone, cross-platform software. In 2003, TecMap 5 was launched. This was a major upgrade that included a WFS server for viewing and publishing KML files of topologies. Not long after its release, an external WFS server known as the "Advanced Open GIS Consortium" was published to provide an even more robust set of standards for querying KML files.
