Canine Choroid Plexus Hyperplasia: A Review of Imaging Findings. Choroid plexus hyperplasia (CPH) is a rare condition with possible causes ranging from birth insults to a host of canine congenital disorders. The aim of this study was to provide a review of the MR imaging findings of CPH in the dog and to compare the clinical and imaging findings to findings in other species. The use of MR imaging was found to be crucial in the early diagnosis of CPH in the dog. Lesions were typically hyperintense on T2-weighted and T1-weighted sequences as a result of the T2 and T1-weighed signal intensities of the choroid plexus, respectively. MR findings of CPH are typically consistent with those reported in humans and in other species, and thus, interpretation of MR images of the cerebral ventricles in the dog can be applied to the brain of other species. When CPH is suspected, a complete neurologic examination and a thorough search for congenital disorders of the neuroectodermal diseases must be conducted.Q: How do I return the url attribute of h:outputLink I have a Hash
