For more information, you can visit: Testing and Ultrasonography to Predict the Outcomes of Primary Outpatient Laryngoscopy: A Retrospective Review. This study was conducted to determine whether invasive testing and ultrasound (US) of the cricothyroid membrane during an outpatient clinic visit would improve the prediction of difficult laryngoscopy. The records of 75 consecutive adults who presented to an outpatient otolaryngology clinic for an elective laryngeal procedure were reviewed. All patients received an extensive screening including preoperative risk assessment using the American Society of Anesthesiologists (ASA) physical status classification, Mallampati examination, and neck palpation. Patients with a Mallampati score of 3 or greater and/or those who had a palpable anterior cervical node were classified as having difficult laryngoscopy. Patients were then evaluated with the use of preoperative US in order to measure the diameter of the cricothyroid membrane and thyrohyoid membrane and determine the thyromental and thyrohyoid distance. Postoperatively, patients were assessed for the need for conversion to an inpatient admission, surgical site infection, and postoperative laryngeal oedema. Twenty-nine patients had a history of difficult laryngoscopy and were classified as having a difficult laryngoscopy. All had an ultrasound of the cricothyroid membrane, and 27 (93%) had a US of the thyrohyoid membrane. One patient had a thyrohyoid distance of more than 13 mm. The diameter
