The app was first announced in April, but that's not the only reason why Google added it to the social network. According to the company, Hangouts is part of the Circles feature that allows users to group people by an interest. For those that don't know, Circles is a way to mark users as a part of your personal social circle. Take your best friend, your favorite artist, or any other type of content with you wherever you go because it will be listed in your Circles on Google+. Google is launching Hangouts on Tuesday (Nov. 25), so if you want to know more about what's in store for you, read on. What's new in Hangouts? Hangouts will mark Google+ users from the very beginning. As soon as you log into the Google+ platform, you'll see your Circles, where you can see who you're following, as well as those whom you want to keep up with. The same goes for other Circles, whether it be your business contacts, your family members, or anything you want to share online. Another new feature is the ability to share on other social networks through an embedded app. When you're ready to publish your status update, you can just tap the Publish button and you're off. Hangouts will open as a window so that you can select who to share with.
