The goal of this proposal is to determine the sites in the catalytic active site of Lactobacillus casei glucosyltransferases (GTs) that interact with the substrate and product. The GTs catalyze the addition of a glucose residue from UDP-glucose to a lipid carrier lipid to form a lactobacillic acid glucosylceramide (LacCer). Lactobacillic acid is a short chain fatty acid that increases intestinal cell proliferation. The complex formation between GTs and LacCer is thought to be important for the regulation of the GTs. GTs have been purified, biochemically characterized and their three- dimensional structures determined. The mechanism of catalysis and the nature of interactions with substrates are still unknown. The principal experimental approach will be to use a fusion protein technique to introduce the fluorescent indicator of nucleotide binding, mantGDP, into the active site of a GT. The protein will be purified from E. coli, the mantGDP will be exchanged for GDP and the GT will be assayed for activity with the fluorescent GT substrate NBD-Cer. Kinetic experiments will reveal information on the mechanism of action of the GTs and binding experiments will probe the location of the substrate and product in the GT active site. In addition, the location of the GT catalytic active site
