For example, The decision to expel a research team from a national laboratory after they found an innovative gene therapy that cured kids of a rare disease may be taken back, more tests revealed that the therapy worked. As a result, the subjects should be allowed to use the therapy again. The NIH, which funded the study, now wants the National Institute of Neurological Disorders and Stroke to reverse its decision to defund the research. "NINDS has made a final decision to support the research," a spokesperson for the agency told CNN. "That means the research can continue, and NIH staff can work to assist the research team with their work. NIH also wants to be clear that the agency's decision to fund the research has not changed; we are supporting the ongoing research." The teams of researchers found an innovative gene therapy by altering the genes of patients, using a vector that allowed them to target the genes to brain cells without damaging
