Adobe Download Manager. Tuesday, September 19, 2012 More than a decade ago, we found ourselves working in a high school library. The school was on the verge of an award-winning reputation in its in-state athletics program, and the library was on the verge of being shut down. We were given carte blanche to do what we pleased with the book collection and used the opportunity to establish a reading program. We set a new book collection policy that required all students to bring a book to school with them each day. So many students took advantage of this that we needed several book boxes just to hold all of the books! It was a totally different program from the one we had established for the entire state. Rather than have teachers serve as "book monitors" to keep track of every book and book borrower, we enlisted a team of volunteers to be the book monitors. These volunteers each received a two-week training on how to monitor the collection and the daily book flow, but they were very willing to teach their fellow students. In fact, one of the best things we did was to bring all of the books that the students were borrowing home to display. We had a school-wide "pop-up" book fair, which brought a wonderful community center feel to the library. This program was so successful that we sent notes home to the parents explaining how their children could check out books as long as they returned them on time, and the program continued in place for years. The lessons we learned from this program carried over to other initiatives at our school: How would we serve our school community better? What would we do if we knew the answer to this question? How would we best use volunteer services? What systems would we institute to help our team members carry out their responsibilities? We started this program on a team of librarians and volunteers, but each idea has been tried out on other staff members. How would we best use these ideas and how would they impact others in our workplace? The answer is, it's a mystery. The possibilities are many. The answers may be creative and vary from person to person. As a management team, we try to keep a library-wide perspective. The answer may not be an obvious one.

I have just started using code igniter and I am struggling with the approach I should use. I want to do something like this: $data = $this->db->query(" SELECT * FROM users WHERE phone='$mobile' AND username='$username'"); $result['name'] = $data[0]['name']; The above code is what I know is wrong. A: Something like this should do it. $this->db->select('*'); $this->db->from('users'); $this->db->where('phone', $mobile); $this->db->where('username', $username); $query = $this->db->get(); $result = $query->result(); $result should now be a array of objects for you to work with. EDIT: As answered by some others the above would be calling the active record function select, which is fine for queries that are not inserts. If you're working with inserts or updates use the active record function query which will return a query object. t i s t h e n e a r e s t t o v i n - 0 . 2 , - 1 , 3e33713323
