What's New in the?

The overall goal of the proposed research is to determine how a balance of calcium and phospholipid is maintained in plasma and in the inside of cells. The phenomena of calcium-induced aggregation of phospholipids and the effects of protein and phospholipid on phospholipase activity are under study. Calcium and phospholipid are ubiquitous and are implicated in a number of biological processes involving interaction with protein, e.g. in the aggregation of blood coagulation factors, in the initiation of platelet aggregation, in actin rearrangement in cytoskeletal dynamics and muscle contraction, etc. In all the above processes, and in other biological processes, the effects of calcium and phospholipid on protein function are mediated through their effects on phospholipid. The overall goals of this project are to study the structure of the calcium and phospholipid aggregates that occur in solutions of phospholipids at physiological pH as well as the effect of protein and other compounds on these aggregates. In addition, studies will be performed to investigate the influence of binding of calcium and phospholipids to membrane protein in the mechanism of their biological actions. But it's not yet over. Although the scope of the project is fairly well defined, there are still the details, and the Beltline could still be undone or at least damaged by some of the more conservative members of its governing board. The Beltline's official opening will be celebrated May 31, although some of the open spaces in the park are already being used for drainage. The Chain of
