Field of the Invention This invention relates to a method of making a releasable fastener. 2. Prior Art Numerous methods of producing releasable fastener assemblies are known in the art. For example, fastener assemblies of this type are used in the manufacture of tufted carpets and in the attachment of closures to bottles. It is well known to construct a releasable fastener assembly with a frangible element such as a filament. The filament may be made of a hardened or otherwise tough material to retain strength at least in the part to which it is attached, and such filament can be broken, that is to say torn or otherwise detached from the supporting structure for the filament. When the filament is broken it becomes detached from the support structure, in which case the assembly becomes releasable. In the manufacture of tufted carpets such releasable assemblies are typically used for making holes through the backing of the carpet to the face of the carpet. Such releasable assemblies are also useful for other applications, such as tying or joining footwear together, in which case the releasable assembly is formed with a filament and a support structure having a pair of spaced hooks formed thereon.

When such a filament and a pair of hooks are placed on a piece of footwear and subjected to a pull, the filament breaks and the hooks are released from the support structure, leaving the footwear releasably held on the support structure. The invention of the present application is particularly suitable for making holes through the backing of a carpet and to the face of the carpet, and for holding footwear to the support structure.
