We take the negative log-likelihood of each distribution as a test statistic to determine when two models are sufficiently different to be considered distinct. We present an algorithm that is guaranteed to produce an output consisting of all k models of size m such that the proportion of the data that distinguishes the k th from the remaining models is at least $1-\beta$ for any $\beta \in [0,1]$. In addition, the test has error at most r . This test has size at most $\frac{k(k-1)(k+1)}{2}r$ under the null hypothesis. When there are an infinite number of models to test, the number of subsets grows exponentially with the number of models. We present an algorithm for this problem that uses deterministic primitives and is guaranteed to produce the correct number of subsets k regardless of the number of models. This test has error at most r , and the number of subsets that are reliably tested is a constant fraction of the number of models. To validate the efficacy of the algorithm, we
