Voces Voces is a Microbiology program that reads the content of files in three ways and notifies users when a file has been updated. Morphological changes of livers with metastasized and non-metastasized canine melanoma. Changes in the livers were evaluated macroscopically, microscopically and ultrastructurally in dogs with melanoma. The effects of treatment were evaluated after four months of treatment. The distribution of metastasized lesions was assessed in eight dogs with histopathologically detectable lesions. The livers of the five dogs without demonstrable metastases appeared normal macroscopically and microscopically. The livers of five of the six dogs with detected metastases were firm and the surface nodular and cystic lesions were composed of pigmented neoplastic cells admixed with fibrous tissue. Prominent fibro-vesicular changes were seen in the livers of all the dogs. Ultrastructurally, cytological atypia was seen in the cell nuclei of these animals, but no intracellular crystalline inclusions or a virus-like particle was seen. These animals received chemotherapy and other supportive treatments. After four months of treatment, four of the five dogs with metastases were still alive; one dog was euthanized owing to recurrence of the disease. The treatment induced a morphological response in the affected livers. Changes included the disappearance of the intralobular fibrous septa, the enlargement of central veins and the increased vascularity of sinusoids. Comparison between the dogs with and without metastases showed that no difference in the pattern of the morphological changes was seen, except in the number of pigmented cells in the sinusoids.
