There was a time when monitors were not used for anything but gaming... Remember that?! :-) Now monitors are such a vital part of our computing world, that they often outperform our CPUs in importance and speed. But what do we do with the behemoth of a display? Since the desktop screen is so crucial to our computing experience, it can get neglected, because anything that the user does with the computer can be seen by the person sitting across from him. Even in multi-screen setups, the individual screen can get "out of sight". Using a Monitor as a "Computer Mouse" - Having the monitor the size of a mouse, one can use it as a mouse, simply by scrolling the mouse over different areas of the screen (where there are icons/windows). - Likewise, one can point with the mouse, and get a "pop-up" display of whatever is underneath the mouse. - Some programs use this paradigm, but some don't want to show all your files under the mouse, and some don't want to show any files under the mouse (like the image-graphics programs). The best you can hope for is "A small pop-up window" where you see a thumbnail of what the program shows under the mouse. - A big monitor (horizontal) makes it easy to scroll along the screen, either up or down. - More buttons are always good (and allow for "point-of-interest" logging, which is a huge time saver).
