The aim of this study was to clarify the association between NOD2 mutations and ankylosing spondylitis (AS) risk. A systematic review and meta-analysis was performed. The primary outcome was incidence of the NOD2 R334W mutation in AS patients and controls. The secondary outcome was AS risk in the carriers of the NOD2 R334W mutation. Twenty-four population-based case-control studies, including 3,822 AS cases and 6,885 controls, were included. Meta-analysis showed that the NOD2 R334W mutation frequency was significantly increased in AS patients compared with controls (odds ratio (OR) = 1.24, 95% confidence interval (CI) = 1.13-1.36), as was the carrier rate (OR = 1.55, 95% CI = 1.30-1.85), and association was independent of HLA-B*27 positive status. Sensitivity analysis revealed a robust association between NOD2 and AS susceptibility. The results of this study suggest a potential role for the NOD2 R334W mutation in AS susceptibility.Q: How to change web page using javascript I have a web page with submit button that is calling an action
