Important Work Safe A file sitting on a computer is much easier to lose than a drawing on a canvas or a printed piece of art. Fortunately, you can transfer or store your work in several ways to be more sure that it stays safe. Your best bet is to have at least one copy of your image in two different locations, in case one of your locations is rendered inoperable by weather, damage, or natural disasters. This is not a bad idea for any type of work but especially for artwork. Artwork is more difficult to restore. These are some of the methods to store, or transfer, your important work: * Save the file to the hard drive: * You can save your art in any number of ways, but when you're done, save the file in a location on your hard drive. If you haven't backed up regularly, it's possible that your hard drive's contents may be lost. Make sure that you back up regularly, either on DVD or tape or hard drive. If you use an online backup service, use the transfer method described in Chapter 13. * Save the file to a storage device: * If you don't store your artwork online, try to save it to a storage device, a hard drive, a memory card, or any similar location. You can store the files on as many different devices as you like. If you keep several at different locations, you may be able to locate your work in the event that one of the devices is damaged or lost. This is a very good idea if your hard drive is damaged or if you have to buy a new one, for example. If you save your work to a storage device, you should back it up to a device or on the Internet. The Internet is the safest place for you to store your art. The Internet enables you to rest assured that your work

Surfactants are classified as: Type 1: water-soluble surfactants Type 2: cosolvents or cosurfactants: a hydrophobic surface active agent blended into the formulation, which is miscible with the solvent but forms a layer at the interface with water Type 3: lipidic surfactants: hydrophobic bile salts, fats or triglycerides which have amphipathic properties Most surfactants are poorly soluble in water. Differential solubility in water and in the hydrophobic phase causes a miscibility gap. Miscible surfactant/oil systems are thermodynam
