The purpose of this study was to develop a patch system for sustained delivery of the anti-inflammatory immunosuppressive agent tacrolimus. The system consisted of an impermeable backing layer of polyurethane and a drug-loaded transparent microporous patch which was covered by a nonpermeable polymer film to provide mechanical stabilization, a protective layer for the skin and a reservoir for the drug. Intra- and interskin diffusion of the drug through the microporous layer in the patch was evaluated using three different preparations: a drug-in-polymer dispersion in excipient carrier phase (esterified polyethylene glycol), a drug-in-polymer solution in non-esterified polyethylene glycol, and a drug-in-polymer dispersion in ionic liquid. Drug release was dependent on the drug-polymer ratio. The most rapid drug release occurred in the polymeric dispersion in excipient carrier phase; however, the release was less than that obtained using the aqueous dispersion in non-esterified polyethylene glycol. A stable and closed patch containing tacrolimus and poly(vinyl pyrrolidone-co-2-dimethylamino-2-methyl-1-propylpropanediol) was obtained, and the patch system demonstrated sustained delivery, providing a pharmacokinetic profile with values that were similar to those obtained with the unencapsulated drug.
