announced the launch of its main European infrastructure, combining its US-based business with existing hosting partners in France and the United Kingdom. The deal will see Cloudflare's network of servers across the three countries operate as a single regional data centre. The centre will be capable of storing the entire internet back-up for any non-EU-based website, which will account for around a third of all such traffic. The Dublin-based company first entered the European market in the summer of 2015, when it launched a local data centre in France, and added the United Kingdom to the existing US network in April 2017. This merger of the US and the European Cloudflare networks – along with a rolling out of a private version of the service – will see the data centre reach its full capacity of one petabyte by the end of the year. Cloudflare has partnered with a hosting firm in France to handle
