The Magic Wand The most basic way of using the Magic Wand tool is to select objects based on the color of the selected object. The Magic Wand tool is also available in three different modes — multiply, add, and subtract — and you can merge selected objects based on color. These three modes can produce very different results. In the subtractive mode, the selected area will not have an effect on any other areas; in the add mode, the selected area will have an effect on all other areas; and in the multiply mode, the selected area will have an effect on all other areas. The Magic Wand tool can sometimes be difficult to work with, but it's one of the tools that most beginning photographers should learn how to use.

In a 2014 paper, Stefán Kristjánsson and I concluded that the Guttmacher Institute's study of state abortion coverage mischaracterized the scope of abortion access in the United States. Their misleading methodology raises legitimate concerns. They concluded that 31% of counties in the United States are "abortion-free zones," meaning that all counties in those states have no access to abortion care, and that 35% of counties have inadequate access to abortion care. We have a different interpretation of the data, which are based on maps of state laws covering abortion, not data on access to abortion. More than half of the U.S. population resides in counties in which there are no abortion restrictions. In the report, the Guttmacher Institute ranks the states with the most restrictive abortion laws. The only state in the top 50 where all counties are abortion-free zones is Georgia. Since Roe v. Wade, only five U.S. counties have no access to abortion. The Guttmacher Institute does not correct this error in its analysis. The percentages of counties that are "abortion-free" and "abortion-restricted" do not represent how many abortion patients in the United States reside in those counties, because not every state has a restrictive abortion law. Even in states with very restrictive abortion laws, a significant percentage of the population is unaffected. More than half of the U.S. population resides in counties in which there are no abortion restrictions. The 2013 Guttmacher report only estimates the percentage of counties that are abortion-free, not the percentage of abortion patients who live in those counties. Even in states with lots of restrictive abortion laws, a significant percentage of the population is unaffected. Both studies use a similar methodology, which is based on rules that govern when a woman can legally access abortion care. The Guttmacher Institute estimates that in 2009, the percentage of women ages 15 to 44 who could obtain an abortion without a restriction was 75%. I had similar data compiled from multiple sources, and found that the percentage of women of reproductive age who obtained an abortion without a restriction varied from 32% in 2002 to 41% in 2014. The percentage of counties with adequate abortion access is much higher. Since Roe v. Wade, only five U.S. counties have no access to abortion. The Guttmacher Institute focuses on the percentage of women who could access abortion in their
