A: I'm just going to suggest the most trivial solution. It will not perfectly fix the problem, but it will add a new line at the end of your output. echo "piped into a file" | python3 -c 'import sys;print(sys.stdout.write("bar "));' Output: bar I don't know why you are creating a file called stdout. If you had any projects that used it, I would suggest renaming it. If you need your program to print to a file, I would suggest using subprocess.call() or Popen() to call it and write to it. import subprocess; subprocess.call(["python3", "-c", "import sys;print(sys.stdout.write('bar '))"]) A preview of the book, Caring Communities: Organizing to Promote Well-Being, is included below. Pages 8 - 9 of the book are also available for review by local leaders. The author describes caring communities and its correlates as follows: Caring communities are communities where people feel empowered to make the changes needed to improve the quality of their lives. Caring communities are good for people, good for the environment and good for the economy. The authors describe how their research demonstrated that: Caring communities are characterized by belief in people and their capacities to change, and a strong ethic of community. Caring communities have a framework of community resources, including culture, education, skills, mentors, technology, and rules and norms. Caring communities are characterized by caring for each other and caring for the environment. Caring communities are characterized by quality organizations, including a strong sense of purpose and a planning process. Caring communities are characterized by collaboration and leadership. Caring communities create strong stakeholder groups. These "caring communities" are not new, but it has been some time since they received the prominence they deserve. Richard Florida, in his book The Rise of the Creative Class, writes about the importance of high creativity in creating caring communities. In Caring Communities: Organizing to Promote Well-Being, Heidegger and Kreisel also stress the importance of creating caring communities by engaging the community 3e33713323
