First-principles identification of fluorinated hydrocarbon adsorption on graphene: new architectures for graphene-based sensors. This work reports a theoretical study of the adsorption of fluorinated hydrocarbon compounds (FHCs) on graphene, through a series of explicit calculations using van der Waals density functional theory (DFT) with dispersion corrections (DFT-D2) and with the extended-Hückel molecular orbital-mapping method. Based on the results obtained, we suggest several new adsorption geometries that deserve experimental verification, particularly in the area of hydrogen storage and detection. The novel results are supported by previous studies on the mechanisms of hydrogen sorption by graphene and other carbon materials and previous works involving the prediction of pristine, defective graphene sheets and carbon nanotubes.
