Justin McVety, a Toronto retail expert, says prices for household supplies like milk and bread have spiked in the last week. And since grocery stores are dependent on consumer confidence for most of their income, the situation has been made worse by a drop in consumer confidence over the last month. "My prediction is we'll see a dramatic rise in the price of bread, milk, eggs and groceries in general over the next two weeks," McVety says. But as bad as the situation may be at this time, it could get much worse if current prices continue. "The price of oil is supposed to drop back to somewhere between $25 and $30 a barrel," McVety says. "If it doesn't go back down to that range, that is a tsunami for the Canadian consumer." In September 2008, the price of oil spiked to $147 a barrel. It has been at $99 a barrel for most of this year, but most experts expect it to drop to between $60 and $70 a barrel before a temporary plateau occurs in the first quarter of 2009. McVety says the drop in oil prices should translate into more money in the pockets of Canadians, which would mean less stress for them at this time of the year. But there are other factors that could make the situation much worse. "If the global economic situation continues to deteriorate as we expect, we could see another crisis emerge in the world oil markets," he says. Oil prices affect the price of other petroleum products, McVety says, which means that gas and fuel prices could also go up. And unless there are significant changes in supply and demand, the situation could just get even worse over the next few months. "
