A study in cattle using a new beef-type anthrax vaccine (BVAC) was conducted to determine the immunogenicity and protective efficacy of two routes of vaccination: oral (p.o.) and intramuscular (i.m.) administration. Twenty-four calves were allotted to 4 groups (n = 6 each) according to age and body weight. Calves in groups 1 and 2 were immunized p.o. at the age of 2 or 4 months (1/2 dose) with 1 ml of a 0.01-mg anthrax vaccine, and calves in groups 3 and 4 were immunized at the age of 2 or 4 months (2/2 dose) with 1 ml of a 0.1-mg anthrax vaccine, respectively. The vaccine consisted of a combination of anthrax toxin subunit A (rPA) and protective antigen (rPA) and was adsorbed to aluminum hydroxide. All calves were challenged i.m. and p.o. with live anthrax spores 2 months after immunization. Serum samples for antibody titration were collected every 2 weeks after the first immunization, and challenged spore counts were carried out to evaluate protective efficacy. At 21 days after the second immunization, all calves were challenged orally with live spores, and the anthrax spore count in blood was then determined to evaluate the protective efficacy of both vaccines. Only calves in group 4 were protected from spore challenge, with a challenge spore
