Testicular oligozoospermia by sperm 3-hydroxy-3-methylglutaril-coenzyme A-reductase deficiency. The incidence of genetic defects in human spermatogenesis is difficult to quantify but, in its mildest form, it may affect 1-3% of all men. We have demonstrated that a 4969 C----T base pair mutation in the HMGCL gene is responsible for 3-hydroxy-3-methylglutaril-CoA-reductase deficiency, an autosomal recessive disorder characterized by oligozoospermia, decreased serum cholesterol levels, and hepatosplenomegaly. Here, we report that a similar mutation in the HMGCL gene from a 46,X,t(Xp11;Yp11) male affected with severe oligozoospermia was responsible for his clinical phenotype. Testicular biopsy results confirmed severe spermatogenic arrest. In vitro translation of the mutated and the wild-type HMGCL cDNA transcripts in a rabbit reticulocyte lysate demonstrated a statistically significant decrease of HMGCL enzyme activity in the sperm samples of the affected patient (2-10%) compared with 10-100% in normozoospermic individuals ($p = 0.0019$). In contrast, no statistically significant difference in a patient with nonobstructive azoospermia, known to be caused by alterations in the Y chromosome, was observed. These results provide evidence that HMGCL is required for spermatogenesis. Here's some example content. Here's some example content.
