Infections caused by norovirus are associated with high morbidity and mortality rates. The aim of this study was to identify the clinical and epidemiological characteristics of acute gastroenteritis in young children and their family environment in the Municipality of São Luís, Maranhão, Northeast Brazil. An observational cross-sectional study was carried out on children aged less than 5 years admitted to the emergency department of the "Gávea" Medical Center in the Municipality of São Luís, Maranhão, Northeastern Brazil, between July and December 2012. The children and their family members were interviewed using a standardized questionnaire. Descriptive statistical analysis and a determination of the risk factors for the occurrence of vomiting in children were performed using the chi-square test and multivariate logistic regression. A total of 108 children and their family members agreed to participate in the study. The median age of the children was 12 months (interquartile range: 6-24 months); 65.3% were aged less than 24 months. The clinical manifestations included vomiting (71.3%), diarrhoea (75%), dehydration (77.2%), high-grade fever (54.6%), loss of appetite (42.3%), nausea (35.2%) and headache (30.6%). Among the studied children, 75.9% of the family members had been ill during the 4 weeks preceding the study. Of these, 89.7% did not inform any health professionals about the event; and 35.7% lived with other children. Although this study was done before the spread of the new GII.4 variant, the high frequency of the norovirus RNA in children less than 2 years
