Progressive external ophthalmoplegia, myopathy and muscle cell death. Progressive external ophthalmoplegia (PEO), a rare autosomal recessive muscle disorder, is characterized by ptosis, proximal limb weakness, exercise intolerance and ragged red fibers on muscle biopsy. It occurs in a chronic progressive manner with little potential for recovery in adulthood. Onset is between 25 and 35 years. The pathogenesis of PEO is elusive but the recent identification of autosomal dominant mutations in the mitochondrial genome has opened new perspectives on the underlying pathophysiology. This review provides an overview of the main features of PEO and summarizes the current knowledge on the biochemical and molecular mechanisms that may lead to skeletal muscle damage and cell death. Several studies have clearly demonstrated that the mitochondrial deficit precedes and may contribute to the muscle cell damage. We propose that a common pathogenic pathway could be involved in all cases of PEO, whether they are caused by an impairment of the respiratory chain, by an excess of mtDNA mutations or by a combination of both.

We also discuss the new therapeutic approaches that have been tried in PEO and describe experimental therapeutic approaches that have led to the demonstration of the protective role of exercise.[A preliminary study of quantitative analysis of intestinal microecosystem of patients with Crohn's disease]. To evaluate the relationship between intestinal microecosystem and active inflammation in patients with Crohn's disease. The feces samples were collected by the cathartic method from 33 active Crohn's disease (CD) patients and 33 age-matched healthy volunteers. The samples were analyzed for the intestinal microbial population, using culture-dependent and -independent methods. Quantitative PCR was used to measure the relative concentrations of bacteria, such as Bacteroides fragilis group, clostridium coccoides, clostridium leptum and actinomyces, and specific species. The B. fragilis group were mainly detected in the feces of healthy individuals and CD patients. The clost
