The views expressed here are solely hers.) PHNOM PENH, Sept. 8 — On June 27, 1943, a bomb destroyed the British Colonial Secretariat. The shell-shocked British officials were sitting down to tea when the bomb exploded, scattering books and papers around their table. A little boy was sent to pick up the books, and his mother, according to an affidavit filed with the International Court of Justice, went with him. The boy turned up without the books, and the mother decided to take them to the British naval office on the grounds that someone there might recognise her son. After some searching, she found the right office and handed the books over. The official on duty listened to what she was saying and warned her to return to the Secretariat and collect her husband's books. Moments later, as she was leaving, the mother was killed and the little boy wounded. This is not a story that people know in Sri Lanka. But it happened here 40 years ago. It is a story that went on to influence the fate of my country. By July 27, 1944, the British were forced to leave Sri Lanka. It is easy to blame the dropping of the bomb, which was a reprisal for the March 18, 1944, killing of Sir John Kotelawala, the last Governor-General of Ce
