Even though the latest version of the Google Cloud SQL service still uses MySQL (now 8.0), Google is slowly moving to adopting the NoSQL cloud standards so that it can provide a more complete solution for storage, machine learning, and artificial intelligence (AI). Cloud SQL, for those unaware, is a solution from the Google Cloud Platform for SQL and BigQuery. It consists of a low-cost, secure managed service that allows Google to quickly roll out cloud-based SQL and data warehousing for its big data tool Cloud Dataflow. You can use Cloud SQL to store, query, and analyze BigQuery and Cloud Dataflow data in Google Cloud. This week, Microsoft also released SQL Server on Azure, an SQL service that is built on top of SQL Server 2017. In fact, the Azure SQL Database has the same SQL Server 2017 engine as the Cloud SQL. Microsoft will introduce a preview version of the Azure SQL Database in April 2017. Adoption of NoSQL for Cloud Storage Google Cloud's jump to NoSQL can be explained in part by adoption of other NoSQL solutions in Google. While it does continue to develop a solution with its own service, it's wise to stay up to date with the new technologies that help keep your workloads running smoothly. This is where things get interesting in Google Cloud. Google started off with a big NoSQL statement when it launched BigQuery, its PaaS that allows developers to build and run ad
