There are two approaches to functional programming editors. So I'm going to describe the object-based and the imperative based ones. And the differences between them, and then I'll give you some examples. One thing that functional programming systems have that object-oriented systems don't have is the ability to write subroutines. So for example, the object-oriented way of doing error handling in a functional programming environment is we either throw exceptions, we don't like function calls, or we get panicky and print. Whereas the functional way of doing error handling is that the program terminates. There's no garbage collection, so if you make a mistake it doesn't go away. It continues to be a bug and everything that wasn't very important before is now very important. That's true for error handling in general. Once you start using something like exception handling, you need error message strings because you can't just print out error messages, it's not very useful. So in the object-oriented approach, you have to build a whole framework in which all of this stuff can exist. You have to build the whole system and you're often-- the main program can be quite big. Whereas in the functional approach you just get the interpreter, which is like 250 lines or something, and that interpreter lets you do anything that you can think of. You write it in C. It's not called C. It's like your favorite language. So the difference between the two is the ability to write subroutines and error messages. And if you write your subroutines in any language, they're still functions. The amount of boilerplate code 1cdb36666d
