A: I've wanted a similar thing for over a year but couldn't find something good enough. I had tried a few but they all had a specific flaw. I ended up just using a dark theme and combining it with transparency for the background. It may not be the fastest (and not necessarily the best), but I still find it convenient. I have a few themes available to me (this one is called "Oh, Silencio"): This one is a bit darker and shinier: You don't need to use the above picture, I've edited it a bit. You just need to make sure that your background color is transparent. Then you can just put whatever background you want above it. Genitalization, masculinity, and anxiety among Colombian pre-adolescents. This paper explores the concept of masculinity in early life and examines its relevance to the onset of anxiety and to the relationship between genitalization, masculinity, and anxiety in adolescents from Bogotá, Colombia. We hypothesized that the association between anxiety and genitalization would vary by sex and that, while most boys would try to affirm a masculine identity through genitalization, a substantial percentage of girls would not do so. The hypothesis was partially confirmed, given that in both boys and girls, higher levels of anxiety were related to more masculine attitudes toward genitalization. In boys, this association was stronger among those who affirmed their masculinity through genitalization, while among girls, anxiety was associated with a more appropriate role in relationships and with lack of sexual preferences, regardless of the attitudes toward genitalia. We hypothesize that boys who lack feminine and/or masculine attitudes might be more vulnerable to the influences of others' attitudes toward masculinity. In addition, we suggest that girls who have not affirmed their feminine identity
