Women soccer players orgy with their coach .(30)P/(31)P ratios as a quantitative measure of phosphorus bioavailability: an examination of 11 differential extractants. Incorporation of (31)P/(30)P isotopes into the mineral fraction of phospholipid is a useful measure of the contribution of inorganic phosphorus to plant and animal diets, as well as to food products. While differential extractants are well suited to releasing organic phosphorus compounds from soils and other complex matrices, little is known about the relative effectiveness of such extractants for the extraction of (31)P/(30)P in bioavailable inorganic phosphorus fractions. The aim of this study was to determine if different extractants would produce ratios of (31)P/(30)P that are proportional to the phosphorus bioavailability of the source material. Eight mineral-free soils having a mean available P of 0.98 mmol kg(-1) were treated with 11 extractants, and their effect on the (31)P/(30)P ratios of the extraction solutions was measured using Inductively Coupled Plasma Mass Spectrometry (ICPMS). Extracts from 0.1 M HCl, 1 M Na₂CO₃, and 1 M HCl-0.1 M Na₂CO₃ yielded similar (31)P/(30)P ratios of 1.60-1.64, while mineral-free distilled water, triethyl phosphite, and ethanol yielded ratios of 4.22, 4.38, and 5.20 respectively. Trisodium pyrophosphate, NaHCO₃, glycine, and butylamine yielded ratios of 4.50, 5.70, 5.77 and 6.40 respectively. While all extractants yield ratios that are proportional to the available P of the source material ($r^2 = 0.78-0.99$), there is considerable overlap, indicating that for such ratios no single extractant is optimal for all soils and substrates, and indicating the need for further research into the development of new extractants.

Part 1 movie and were now the biggest influencer in music and social movements across the globe. patients, the structure was found to be associated with an increased accuracy of measurement of the left ventricle end-diastolic volume and a decreased accuracy of measuring the left ventricle end-systolic volume. Some studies have reported that both the relative location and coronary angiography do not affect the accuracy of volume measurement by CMR in patients with normal heart function ([@ref29][@ref34]). In contrast, other studies have shown that the location of the heart in the chest cavity and the structure of the heart may cause errors in the measurement of LV volumes, especially when the segments covered by the artifacts are included in the ventricular volumes obtained by CMR ([@ref1][@ref30]). In the present study, no difference was observed in the accuracy of LV volume measurement between patients with a normal heart and normal anatomic reference values and those with abnormal heart anatomy. This finding may have been caused by the relatively small sample size. The present study has certain limitations. First, although the heart location was adjusted by the right lateral decubitus position and the heart was imaged without breath-holding during RHC, the heart was imaged using the natural three-plane orientation during free breathing. Therefore, the axial plane of the heart in the right lateral decubitus position was not the same as the imaging plane of the heart using free breathing. Second, the samples were small, and the LVEF and the volume of the LV determined by CMR were measured by the experienced independent observer. In the future, to ensure that the results in different centers can be compared, the volume and LVEF of the LV should be measured by an experienced observer, and the results should be validated using a larger sample size and the patients should be followed up by the same observer. In conclusion, the LV volume obtained by CMR is highly correlated with the LVEF measured by RHC, and the absolute volume of the LV determined by CMR is significantly lower than that measured by RHC. The different volumes of the LV obtained by CMR and RHC are correlated with the
