people have been killed and hundreds more injured after a strong earthquake hit Papua New Guinea. The 6.1 magnitude tremor struck at around 6pm yesterday in the province, well below the Pacific country's mountainous centre. It was felt across a wide area, with destructive tremors reported in New Britain and the Western Highlands. More than 40 houses collapsed and a number of walls crumbled in PNG's largest city, the capital Port Moresby. Power cuts and cracks were reported in some buildings and all public transport has been cancelled in some parts of the city following the quake. Prime Minister Peter O'Neill said the death toll would be higher but was not yet known. "The count is still increasing. Some buildings collapsed. We don't know if those people are inside," he said. "We have reports of dead bodies in residential houses." Residents have been asked to avoid the Port Moresby CBD and the government has called on those in vulnerable buildings to move to safe locations.

Supplies of water and food have been brought into the city but running water has not been restored across several parts. Four people are in hospital, some suffering minor injuries and another woman and her baby were transferred to a trauma centre for treatment. The quake was so strong it caused a gas leak and alerted members of the public to evacuate. "A number of houses were damaged, with walls collapsing," volunteer nurse Ginger Ate told AAP by phone from Papua New Guinea's capital. "Some of the houses have collapsed into the streets, and these houses are occupied by several families."
