Note With almost all the steps in this section, you can apply your editing to either a single layer or to all layers. This is particularly useful when you want to apply an effect to a selection of layers, which is covered later in this chapter. This technique works equally well with masks and cloning, so refer to Chapter 7 for details on how to apply these two essential editing techniques. ## Cropping Your Photo In Chapter 8, we said that you should always spend a little time cropping a picture before editing it to make it more attractive. Cropping, or separating an image into a smaller area, is one of the most important image editing tasks that you can perform before you start editing. In previous versions of Photoshop, you had to use dialog boxes to do the job, but more often than not, it was just easier to crop using the tools in the Toolbox or by using an active selection. Either way, you can use this section to get you started. The following steps take you through the process of cropping a picture. 1. Open your image. The background image used in this example

Archive I love the feeling of riding a pure-bred horse. I also love the feeling of holding a really good stallion. I've always thought that it would be great to have a guy who is crazy about horses and who would pay for me to ride a pure bred horse but in real life, I don't think it happens very often. My last horse was a mare who was one of the world's most famous dressage horses, so I was really spoiled. She was showy, beautiful and incredibly talented. But there was one little problem with her: she was afraid of the dark. She would scream during the night. If her instinct was to scream and run away from the noise, then a gelding was the ultimate solution. She's not so afraid anymore (I think because I've moved her into a dark barn). She doesn't believe she's hearing anything, but she still gets up out of bed a couple of times a week and wants to go for a ride. She's always calm and nice and I think she'd make a perfect racing mount. She has such wonderful focus and talent, she would be great on the track. She's also gentle and kind-hearted, she's a very lady horse. I've got a new stallion, Flame, who is a big, strong Hanoverian with a healthy personality. I'm pretty sure that he's one of the sweetest and most gentle stallions out there, just because he's nervous. He's nervous of me, but he's also shy and gentle. With his white and black coat, Flame is a beautiful stallion. His mane is long and bright and his tail is fluffy and white. Flame's likeable, he's too strong to be sweet, but he's a gentle guy and you can tell that he's not just some pretty face. He's a pony in a white shirt. It's not long until he's going into the breeding phase of his life. There's a commercial stud farm close to my home, so I'm going to bring him there in the fall to give him his first mating. When he comes back next spring, I'll be working with him to

Q: Use Case Diagram, Decision Table and State Charts I am wondering if there are any differences between the following three. Which one is better? Which one is better? A: They're all roughly the same, but the workflow might be different in some cases and that means it's hard to answer the question. A common way of implementing a workflow like that is the state charts. It's more a question of how you might think about it. A decision table would usually use start/end states. But the description of the state graphs does not show end states, so it's a generic workflow description. The Side Car A man walks his dog along a country road. The sun shines on them and the dog is happy. They pass a farmhouse. The windows are open. The man hears loud music from inside. The dog starts to jump up and down. The man gets suspicious. The dog is in trouble. The man goes home to his wife and asks her what she is listening to. He becomes even more suspicious. He goes to the window. The music stops. "Well, maybe they're having fun." "That's my dog." "Yeah, I know. I saw him." The man goes back to the door. There is a knock. "Who is it?" "The side car." "What's that?" "I'll show you." The man looks around and sees a side car. The man opens the door. He steps into the side car. "That's a side car?" "This is a side car," says the man's wife. "Oh." "We have one at home." "Oh. Okay." "So, what did you want to do?" "Nothing." "Nothing?" "I just got it for that guy over there." "That's Victor?" "Yeah. He's having a party. I figured it would be fun to give him something to do." "What's it for?" "Well, it's for when he gets tired. You know how dogs get tired." "Sure." "I don't think they have those things in the home. Do they?" "No. They just sit there."
