Q: Which of these odd looking comparisons were removed from Java 7? I recently found this StackOverflow question which points out that: ... the new [JLS] 7.4.5 allows them, and the result of comparing null to null is false. But according to Java 7 Release Notes, JLS 7.4.5 doesn't make any explicit mention of comparing null to null. There are several further references to these changes in the comments. So I'm wondering what happened? A: There is a section in the JLS under 7.5.10.3. Boolean Expressions, which states: The second operand is converted to a boolean value by evaluating: ... - If the second operand is a value of type boolean and the first operand is an expression of type boolean that is compatible with the type of the second operand, then a boolean value composed of the results of the conversion of the first operand to type boolean and the second operand is formed. ... Since the JLS states that the two null values are "compatible" (which, in this case, means that they have the same type, Boolean), the nulls can be compared using the boolean operators. the appearance of a traumatic scar, they are also frequently associated with disturbances in the integrity of the oral mucosa ([B40], [B41]). In cases of lingual keloids, they tend to be located on the tip or the anterior of the tongue and are associated with squamous cell carcinoma ([B40], [B42]). The lesion is often associated with a nonulcerated, recurring, raised, reddish nodule ([B3], [B40], [B42]).

What's New In?

By silencing the big C, we began a new stage I'm standing in a green room looking into a dark, empty audience. Normally these rooms are half-asleep and full of the ghosts and nostalgia of each week's show. But tonight, I'm lost in thought. I'm wondering how many times we'll move through this experience. Tomorrow, I'll leave this place with the whole audience laughing at my foolery. I'll drive home thinking that maybe, just maybe, I'll have a different view of my life by the time I see the ceiling. Who knows, maybe my kids will be too old to want to see their father weep when he goes out for the big showdown. There are still so many roads that go nowhere. The natural enemy of an actor is the audience. The more you speak, the more likely they are to stare at you slack-jawed and only listen half-heartedly. Yet the audience is there to listen. It's part of our job to entertain them, to captivate them, to at least give them the illusion of listening. What I have come to understand is that we can't control the audience. We can't always predict their response. Sometimes you feel the wave of laughter and hear the echo in the red curtains. Sometimes they only stare at you with great expectations. But I don't want to share my personal, ugly thoughts tonight. Tomorrow, I will have to re-adjust my world. I can tell you that I will have many more dark nights because of the decision I made earlier today. I won't share the whole story because there are still many road not taken. And I don't want my kids to be confused and wondering where I went wrong. My big brother was there tonight at the TV studio. He told me of his struggles as a young actor while we watched the big showdown. He told me that he didn't go very far down the road we're on now, but he knew it was going to take many years to get there. I'll share his story next week. For now, I want to talk about what's ahead. I want to talk about the big showdown, the final showdown. This week, my brother
